

EDITORIAL

The publication of the Woolf Report in 1991 has been widely seen as a watershed in the development of penal policy in this country. The Woolf Report was effective in consolidating a range of proposals which had been floating for some time and in presenting a package of penal measures which set a new tone and direction for penal reform.

For a relatively short period of time the Woolf Report has provided a point of focus for both prison reformers and government agencies. However, there are now growing signs that a change of direction is occurring and rather than imprisonment being seen as at best a necessary evil it is now being seen as a positive good. No longer is the size of the prison population to be seen as a negative indicator. Rather, according to Mr Howard, an increased prison population is necessary to reduce crime through a combination of specific and general deterrents.

Rod Morgan who was one of Woolfs' assessors, strongly opposes this recent change in government policy and foresees a new wave of riots and disturbances erupting in our increasingly overcrowded prisons.

Joe Sim, however, argues that Mr Howard's approach to imprisonment is not all that different from that of previous Home Secretaries and warns against the tendency to embrace Woolf's recommendations uncritically.

Andrew Ashworth and Barbara Hudson both comment on what is seen as one of the most significant 'U' turns in recent government policy - the abandonment of the principles of the 1991 Criminal Justice Act and the rapid passing of a new Criminal Justice Act in 1993.

Some of these reversals and paradoxes of penal policy are discussed by Stephen Pryor who is the governor of High Down Prison. Alvin Bronstein examines the proposition that more imprisonment will reduce crime from an American vantage point. The expansion of the penal system in California, he argues, has not only failed to reduce crime but has also drained valuable resources away from other services such as

CONTENTS

CUSTODY

Who Guards the Home Secretary?	Stephen Pryor	3
Prisons: Policy and Reality	Rod Morgan	4
Sentencing Policy and the Prison Population	Andrew Ashworth	6
Some Lessons from America	Alvin J Bronstein	8
Women in Custody	Mary Eaton	10
Back to Basics	Joe Sim	12
Prison Reform in Russia	Roy D King	17
The 1991 Criminal Justice Act	Barbara Hudson	18
Insiders	Inside Time	19
Secure Training Centres	John Harding	20
Suicides in Prison	Alison Liebling	22
Privatising Custody	Mick Ryan	23

ISTD BULLETIN: NEWS & REVIEWS

Editorial + Programme Spring 94	Julia Braggins	13
ISTD Study Tour	Gail Bradley	14
Visit & Seminars	Nic Groombridge/Errol M Sari	14
Conference Report: Changing Policing	Carol Martin	15
AGM Report	Julia Braggins	16

COMMENT AND RESOURCES

Letters to the Editor		25
Book Reviews	Roger Matthews/Adam Edwards	26

education.

Another recent measure which has attracted considerable attention and debate is the planned introduction of secure training centres for 12 to 14 year old offenders to be run by private agencies. John Harding expresses some scepticism in relation to these proposals and points to some of the problems which are associated with the introduction of these new regimes.

Taking a very different point of reference Roy King examines some of the changes which have been taking place in Russia and looks at the prospects of penal reform in a country undergoing substantial social, economic and political change.

Bringing the focus sharply back to the situation in Britain Alison Liebling outlines some of the measures which have been introduced to deal with the problem of suicides in prison. Mary Eaton offers an examination of the current position of women's prisons and looks at some of the more innovative programmes which have been developed in certain institutions.

Finally, Mick Ryan discusses an issue which has become increasingly central to debates about the future of imprisonment not only in this country but around the world.

The impression which arises from this range of timely and thought provoking articles is that the debate on imprisonment has reached a new crossroads. There are a number of conflicting policy choices available and they are all being strongly contested. The debate is characterised by swings of mood from optimism to pessimism, and by swings of policy from centralisation to decentralisation.

At the heart of this debate is an important discussion about the purposes and organisation of imprisonment, which is of significance not only to the growing number of people who are experiencing incarceration but also to those communities to which these prisoners will ultimately return.

Roger Matthews & Julia Braggins

CRIMINAL JUSTICE MATTERS

Number Fourteen, Winter 1993/4. Copyright 1993 ISTD.

Criminal Justice Matters is published by the INSTITUTE FOR THE STUDY AND TREATMENT OF DELINQUENCY
King's College London, Strand, London WC2R 2LS Tel: 071 873 2822 Fax: 071 873 2823

ISTD Director: Julia Braggins; Secretary: Irene Frost; Co-ordinators: Nic Groombridge and Carol Martin; Administrator: Pam Chapman

Editorial Board: Julia Braggins (Editor), Yolande Burgin, Francis Charlton, David Kidd-Hewitt, Paul Kiff, Roger Matthews.

Views expressed in Criminal Justice Matters are those of the contributors and are not necessarily those of ISTD.

Design: Baker Tamborini Creative Services. Typesetting: Amberwood Graphics. Printing: Anglebury-Levey.

Special thanks to Roger Matthews for guest editing this issue and to Peter Dalrymple for the photography.

ISSN: 0962 7251