

mixture is familiar to any worker in the British field of penology, as too are the problems. What is really remarkable here (and not a little enviable) is the clear, authoritative manner in which this government has declined to compromise with outworn ideas, and hence the invaluable lead—one might almost say inspiration—which it is able to give to all progressive forces at work in the social field. One has to turn up the introductory blurb now and then to remind oneself that this is indeed an official statement of policy and not another ivory-tower product doomed to gather departmental dust.

To sum up, I would recommend this book to any fellow-struggler in the penal field who may be suffering from occupational frustration, myopia or indigestion. It makes an ideal short refresher course in aims and principles for the general reader, and contains very little that is of such purely local interest as to bore him.

A New Look at Crime

The second pamphlet in the I.S.T.D New Look at Crime series is now available. As in the case of Denmark, there is scarcely any literature in English on the Dutch penal system and child welfare services; this report gives for the first time a concise and comprehensive assessment of preventive, punitive and therapeutic measures in the Netherlands. The pamphlet includes sections on criminal law and procedure; child welfare services; probation and after-care; with a detailed account of the wide range of institutions visited.

Dr. Keith Wardrop has considerable experience of comparative penal systems both in Europe and America, and is particularly well qualified to sum up the impressions of the I.S.T.D. Summer School. It is fitting, too, that a forensic psychiatrist should write this report on a country which is doing so much pioneer work in the treatment of abnormal offenders.
