First survey results

1. There is very little clarity about what services the voluntary sector will be delivering, or how they will be resourced to do it.
2. The pace of change has been slower than many in the voluntary sector anticipated, leaving organisations in a state of limbo, waiting to see how or if they will be involved in service delivery, making strategic planning and staff retention difficult.
3. A small number of larger voluntary sector organisations report having been able to secure contracts with CRCs to deliver services.
4. The level of NPS engagement with the voluntary sector is largely unknown and needs to be investigated further.
5. The voluntary sector is reporting a sense of apprehension amongst funders and commissioners around what CRCs and the NPS will resource. They report that some independent charitable funders and local commissioners are questioning whether they should fund certain interventions

The voluntary sector's role

- 73% delivering services not directly funded by probation, 70% grant funded
- Of those funded by the CRC (21%), 70% are delivering an existing services
- Only one organisation responded to confirm work with the NPS

Graph 3 / Do you expect to deliver services with (or alongside) Community Rehabilitation Companies (CRCs)?

What's the impact on funding

“Transforming Rehabilitation... has left the work we were funded to do in a state of limbo. [Our contract has] been extended for six months, with no guarantees of how we go forward.”

- Survey respondent

Graph 5 / Has your funding (contractual or grant funding) been affected by Transforming Rehabilitation?

Concluding thoughts

- We still don't know what services will look like
- There's a need to strive for quality with less resource
- The issue of addressing diversity is still paramount
- Clinks will continue to amplify the voice of the voluntary sector
